them that he knew nothing about it.

On another occasion a few weeks ago he was visited by representatives of Simpson and shown a photograph of DeMartini and asked to identify it. The people who produced it insisted on his identification, but he claimed that he could not identify the photograph which they produced as being that of any person that had come to see him either four years ago or since.

In one or two points Mrs. Applegate interpolated remarks that she had seen Henry Stevens on the beach the murder night. She is quite positive about it and apparently cannot be shaken. Her memory is quite convincing. Her recollection as to the time is based on practically the same chain of circumstances as in her husband's case, the inquiries made by reporters and others immediately after the murder, at which time she was able to trace her movements on the murder night more positively than now.
